Abstract

Delayed diagnosis and poor treatment of genital oedema has been described by patients and lymphoedema specialists, suggesting that health professionals may have education needs on this subject. We explored this need in an international survey in 2019, followed by in depth discussions in focus groups. This presentation will share results from this study and describe what happened next... how the findings were used to produce education and information resources for health professionals and patients (e.g. films available on ILF websites) and what will happen next.
